

Monologue. Personality

Кузичева Полина 3530901/10005

Words : 604 Active vocabulary : 33 Grammar structures : 5 Linkers : 10

We live in the world with more than 7 billion people and every human on this planet has their own character, personality and appearance. We all have a different personality. Some of us can be adventurous, charismatic and funny, but another part of people hates being in public and meet new people. Our personality consists of many parts. We shape it by growing up, meeting new people and exploring the world. However, some of us has personal traits that can be found in another person. This fact is called personality types.

There are two main personality types: extrovert and introvert. They were made popular by the important Swiss psychiatrist Carl Jung. Introverts are shy, thoughtful, quiet, whereas extroverts are friendly, sociable, talkative. These types of human personality are the opposites of each other, nevertheless one person can have traits of both types. You can understand the person's type of personality by asking or notice it by yourself in the process of communication: take a look at person's attitude to the world and to the themselves. Furthermore, outward signs can tell about character. As for me, I pay attention to the clothes and body language. As an illustration, extroverts usually prefer bright clothes and wear many accessories, in contrast with introverts prefer calm colors. Also they have various kinds of body language. Extroverts are restless and introverts are more quiet. In my opinion, personality type also makes influence on our choice of future career. Introverts choose jobs that need less communication with people like programmer or writer, but extroverts prefer being in public and talk to other people, because of it they become artists or journalists.

As I have already mentioned, we all have unique personality. People cannot be judged for their character. We become ourselves as long as life endures. If you are interested in learning more about yourself, you can measure your character by personality test. It cannot tell you about who you are, but may give you a hint. Furthermore, this tests were made by psychologists.

One of the personal trait that can have both, extraverts and introverts, is charisma. Charisma is a kind of magic and is relatively rare. Charismatic people can draw people to them and succeed in getting others to see them as a leader. Charismatic people are cheerful, self-confident and decisive, determined. They can stay calm under pressure and plan everything carefully. For instance, Tony Stark is a charismatic person. Although he is a made-up character, he was a leader who could make people believe in his ideas and follow him. Also he knew how to communicate with all kinds of people. He knew how to encourage people to do what is better for them.

Charisma is not that important as being self-confident and organized. You can be not charismatic, but people would believe you if you say right things. If you are a person with principles and determined to do what you planned, there will be no obstacles on your way. You will also be able to draw people to their goal.

Additionally, I would like to tell about the importance of loving yourself. It is the main part of people's existence. Without it you will always doubt in your actions and thoughts. If you love yourself, all your personal traits will bring you luck and you will inspire people.

In conclusion, I would like to say that everyone has a different personality. It is what make people individuals and unique. Some of us may be extrovert, and another one may be both, but we are all people and we are beautiful just the way we are.